Peanut pod blasting is a method used to determine pod maturity prior to digging to maximize on yield. The more mature the pod is, the heavier it will weigh. Extension Agents conduct Pod Blasting Clinics (usually at receiving stations) just prior to harvest season to help growers estimate timely digging to maximize on yield. Growers bring in samples from fields (150 pods) and the agents pressure wash the samples to remove the outer layer of skin from the shell, which will reveal the stage of pod maturity the pods are at. (See Picture) A fully mature peanut will have a black shell, an immature peanut will be light in color, once pressure washed. Looking at the sample of peanuts on the profile board in this picture, this sample needs 10-12 additional days to mature.

Horticulture

- September has been hotter and dryer than normal, this has allowed for certain crops to mature faster and develop a fuller, richer taste, such as grapes. The grape harvest has been good, but nothing spectacular. Our growers need to pay attention to details and do all the little things that add up to a better crop. This same principle can be applied to pecans, apples, pears, etc.
- The pecan crop will not be as big as last year simply because a pecan tree is usually an alternately bearing plant, meaning it bears every other year with a much bigger crop and a small crop in between. Squash, peppers, and okra have been producing this fall in good quantities with fair prices.
- Muscadine Festival turned out to be successful for all the vendors and visitors.
